

Living in a tiny city in the Alp mountains was an unforgettable pleasure...

I spent four months of my master's studies at Savoie Mont Blanc University in Chambéry, France. It was a remarkable experience in academic as well as social ways. The semester in France was a mandatory part of my double diploma degree, but financial aid from the Erasmus scholarship appeared crucial for me to go there. As all the classes were pre-planned for the European and International Business Law program, they were tailored to suit my interests and carrier needs. We attended the lectures and seminars of practicing lawyers working in international corporations, who were well aware of the current developments in contract and corporate law. As soon as I started my internship in the fourth semester, it was clear how realistic their teaching method was and how it actually prepared us for the tasks we would get at law firms.

Living in a tiny city in the Alp mountains was an unforgettable pleasure. I traveled to nearby towns, enjoyed medieval architecture and beautiful landscapes, made local and international friends, and got acquainted with local culture and the most delicious cuisine ever.

Even though adaptation to the new circumstances and acceptance of constant temporary changes, especially as I am a foreign student in Lithuania as well, was stressful at times, from this perspective, it was a life-changing experience making me even more self-sufficient, independent, and capable of pulling through in the unknown and diverse surroundings.
